

Local Soldier Works to Restore Scouting in Iraq

For many in Lamorinda, Scouting is a part of growing up, teaching values that last a lifetime. When Michael Gerson (known to childhood friends as Andrew) was part of Boy Scout Troop 212 in Moraga, he learned courage, respect and responsibility. Those values have served him well as he headed from Campolindo High School to Jacksonville University in Florida on a naval ROTC scholarship, and then to Okinawa, Japan.

But five months ago these values came to the forefront when, after seeing friends returning to Iraq for second tours of duty, Gerson, age 24, volunteered to go to Bagdad. "I'm single, have no dependents, and haven't been - it's my turn," he told his mother, Jamie. He now serves as a Marine Corps lieutenant in Iraq's Green Zone.

Upon his arrival in Iraq, Gerson learned that scouting is not just an American concept.

"Scouting has always been a part of Iraqi culture," explained Gerson on the phone from Iraq. "When Saddam was in power, he turned scouting into a military source and changed a lot of the fundamental views of scouting, but scouting for Iraqis is not a new concept. There are about six scouting leaders involved inside the Green Zone, but 150,000 kids are involved throughout Iraq's 18 provinces."

In fact, the long tradition of scouting in Iraq dates back to the 1920s, but was briefly halted during World War II and then later, when Saddam Hussein turned scouting into a paramilitary training course, Iraq was kicked out of the international scouting organization.

As part of the Green Zone Boy Scout Council, which has nearly 100 members, Gerson and 10 other council members volunteer their time to meet weekly with local Iraqi Boy Scout leaders to retrain them on the skills and concepts of scouting. The Council is also working with the president of the Iraqi scouting movement, Abdul Salaam, who works with the minister of education, to help re-induct the Iraqi scouts into the World Scouting Organization.

"The way scouting works here is that it's tied in with the school program. Teachers are scout masters," Gerson said. The Council meetings focus on training these teacher-leaders on how to run a soccer camp, a campout, or conduct merit badge training.

"We teach the leaders how to tie knots and other basics, and the Iraqi leaders teach the kids. We're in the shadows," he said. "The Iraqis really want to get this started. The hardest thing is getting support. They just don't know what to do next."

After getting involved in the Council, Gerson enlisted the help of his former Scout leader Tom (Mac) Macintosh and another parent he knew from Troop 212, Ken Towers, to get copies of Boy Scout handbooks and merit badge books to the Green Zone.

"The books can be used for those who speak English and they can translate them into Arabic," said Gerson. Macintosh and Towers sent a shipment of books last week. The Iraqis also need camping supplies, utensils, and tents for campouts, but more importantly there needs to be a shift in thinking.

"We need to create new leaders who think about the country first. Scouting creates pride in your nation and promotes town citizenship," Gerson said. "You can think of yourself as an Iraqi who is ALSO from this town or that religious sect. The future of Iraq will be governed by the skills we are teaching the kids today."

Moraga Mayor Michael Metcalf has known the Gersons for 20 years (his son was a scout mate of Gerson's in Troop 212). He is extremely proud of Gerson's efforts. "Here is a terrific example of a young Moraga lad doing something for Iraqi youth that potentially is more enduring than anything else our country could do," he said. "If what he is doing actually takes hold, it will go to further America's good reasons for being there."

Shigeko Ide, Japanese Heritage in Lamorinda

The Ides ended up in Arkansas. Before the camp was built, they were first herded for months in horse stalls at the Tanforan Center in San Bruno. They stayed three years in the wood barracks, in small rooms separated with paper walls, and no running water. Shigeko remembers the small garden they grew to try and get fresh vegetables, the constant walks to common bathrooms and cafeteria, the monotonous diet of beets and mutton stew, the cold winters and the hot summers.

In camp, Shigeko and Harry lived with their family and were blessed with the birth of two daughters. Japanese doctors delivered the babies in the camp. Harry, who had previously wanted to give up his Japanese citizenship and keep only his American one in order to assimilate, refused to confirm that choice when presented with a questionnaire in camp. As a result of not wanting to give up his Japanese citizenship, he was considered disloyal and sent to Tule Lake camp. There, his mail was stamped "enemy mail." In 1946, Shigeko was sent back by bus to Stockton, she was re-united with her husband a year later.

When asked about her feelings at the time of the deportation, Ide says she remembers not being surprised to be sent away: "We were used to being discriminated against, we were different, we had darker skin, it was normal." The chilling statement may partly explain why her generation was called "the quiet generation." They wanted to forget about that period of their lives, and it took the fighting spirit of the new generation to finally get Ronald Reagan to apologize for the US Government in 1988. But maybe as a result of this early experience the grandmother of eight young Americans and honored "Sensei" who lives peacefully in Lafayette, confides that she never wanted to give up her Japanese first name and never felt totally assimilated.
