One day earlier, Diablo Foods opened its doors to Shakira Niazi, founder of Salvare La Vita Water LLC, a non-profit that aims at building wells in Afghanistan by selling local spring water, in what she claims to be 100% biodegradable bottles, and directing the profit to well-building. Niazi, a San Ramon resident, says she has been a supporter of Budd Mackenzie's Trust in Education for over four years and that in many ways her social business was inspired by him. "I've come up with a simple and yet measurable plan," says Niazi, "no donations are required; for every 31 bottles purchased, one person will have access to clean drinking water for 20 years, by building water wells for those in need." The first project was located in Sheberghan with 10 water wells, which should supply 7,500 villagers. Diablo Foods will carry VITA water in its bottled water section. Don't tell Sedrak Tarbinian that he is a car mechanic. The American gentleman of Persian-Armenian origin would show you his repair shop where, if cars are idle with their hoods opened, not a spot of grease or the faintest smell of gasoline can be detected. Tarbinian is an electrical and air conditioning expert, a trade he started in Lafayette 30 years ago. He moved to Los Angeles to be with his family, but returned to Contra Costa, until he could find a place in his beloved Lafayette. "People in Lafayette have class," he says, "they are well traveled and it is a pleasure to do business with them." He welcomes back his old customers and looks forward to meeting new ones.

"This is our way to say thank you to the community for their support," says Connie Collier, daughter of Diablo Foods founder Ed Stokes, "since the opening of Whole Foods on the other side of town our business has declined a bit but has stayed sound. Customers come to me all the time and tell me 'we want you to stay open, we will continue to support you.'" At last Friday's event a band was playing Sinatra songs, while smoothies and sandwiches were graciously offered to customers. Some seemed bewildered; others stopped, had something to eat or drink and engaged in conversation with Stokes, Chamber of Commerce Executive Director Jay Lifson, or Chamber Board member Larry Duson, who all came by to support the local independent grocery.
