With the emphasis on Native American values of respect, honor and being connected to the earth, retired third-grade teacher and longtime Lafayette resident Peggy Magilen recreated a tribe within Lafayette for an intergenerational workshop teaching the ways of the local Saklan Miwok Native Americans.

Miwok experience – creating family names and necklaces, pounding acorns, practicing hunting skills and playing games.

A large display of artifacts, art and children-centered projects greeted visitors to the garden demonstrating connective and successful indigenous living.

Magilen’s goal? To send everyone home with a special sense of Native belonging, which was clearly accomplished with lots of fun along the way.

With the help of volunteers, Magilen gave the 26 attendees of the free event Aug. 5 in the Lafayette Community Gardens the

Local residents can get a charge at three new Lafayette EV stations

Lafayette electric vehicle drivers have more choice in locations when powering up their green cars now since the city has installed three new ChargePoint stations.

ette City Council and are partially funded through a grant from the Bay Area Air Quality and Management District.

The new stations are all on city-owned public parking lots – one at the intersection of Mt. Diablo Boulevard and Oak Hill Road just down from Uncle Yu’s Restaurant and the other two stations at the intersection of Mt. Diablo Boulevard and Risa Road.

Drivers, who previously had to deal with privately owned charging stations such as the ones in the Whole Foods parking lot, will now be able to drive up, swipe their credit card or ChargePoint membership card and pay the 39 cents per kilowatt-hour.

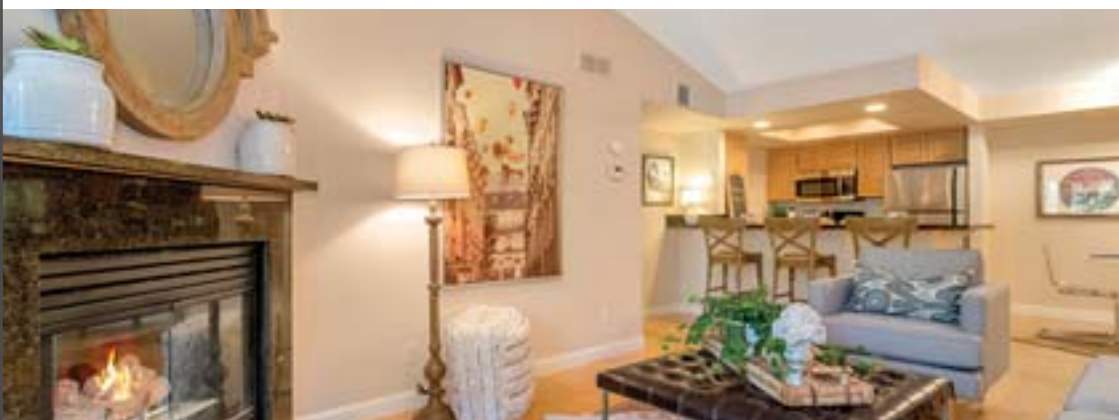

The stations became operational during the last week of June following approval by the Lafayette

City Council and are partially funded through a grant from the Bay Area Air Quality and Management District. So far these are the only charging stations on city land but more are planned, although the timeline is not yet known.
